VALUATION

SENTIMENT

Slightly more than 18 months after the start of a pandemic that has severely disrupted the global economy, forecasters have turned optimistic. Vaccination campaigns are accelerating, economies are gradually reopening, monetary policy remains extremely accommodative and governments' stimulus packages continue to support growth. While we have no concerns about short-term growth (12 to 18 months), we have doubts about the global economy's ability to meet high expectations once all the efforts that are boosting short-term growth come to an end and interest rates begin to normalize. We are maintaining a double-positive rating for the macroeconomic environment (+ +).

The economic scenario implicit in the valuation of world stocks is one of strong, sustainable economic growth, combined with interest rates that remain very low. On average, the major valuation metrics were at the highest levels since the 2000 tech bubble. Such high prices leave very little room for bad news about economic growth, inflation, or health-related matters. Our valuation vector therefore remains at triple negative (- - -).

The global market continued to rise in the second quarter, helped by U.S. equities at the end of June. The decline in interest rates favored growth-large caps, which until then had underperformed in 2021. The technology and consumer discretionary sectors are back in favour with investors, who have abandoned the topic of the "reflation trade", at least for the time being. Very few investors are daring to take a contrarian stance. We are concerned about the sustainability of overheating markets and for that reason we are keeping our sentiment vector at triple negative (- - -).
