Market Outlook

MACROECONOMIC ENVIRONMENT	VALUATION	SENTIMENT

The wave of investments that accompanies major technological changes, such as artificial intelligence, continues beyond economic cycles but pauses during a recession, when access to credit is restricted, demand contracts and uncertainty in business is high. The leading economic indicators and tighter credit standards are signaling that the inflection point in economic activity is approaching. Barely a year into monetary tightening, the resilience of economic data fueling soft landing scenarios is nothing unusual. We have maintained a “double negative” rating on our macroeconomic environment vector.

Active management is often put to the test at the end of the cycle and during periods of euphoria when investor enthusiasm propels valuation metrics to speculative levels. Managers have difficulty justifying exposure to overheated stocks and industries, even as their prices continue to rise. While the U.S. market was in the most expensive decile, Japan and emerging markets were significantly more attractive. However, the large size of the U.S. market makes the global stock market expensive. We maintain a “double negative” rating on our market valuation vector.

Discipline is difficult to maintain in overheated markets as highly sought-after stocks and industries surge far beyond the selection criteria of most investment processes. Humility and caution are called for, whether during the market’s ascent or descent. Even though our sentiment index was rather neutral at the end of the second quarter, as a result of highly concentrated returns and investors’ highly procyclical positioning we have lowered the sentiment vector to “single negative.”

Our analysis of the three vectors has prompted us to maintain a defensive bias. We are concerned about the deteriorating economic growth outlook and its impact on corporate earnings, in a context where market valuation and investor positioning are not pricing in a slowdown.
